

ABSTRACT

The invention relates to a support device which is designed to be installed between an aircraft engine and an associated thrust reverser, said device being equipped with a support means which can support at least one fire-detection element in the form of a capillary. The invention is characterized in that the support means comprises at least two retaining members which can be removably assembled to one another.